Injury prevention programming can increase productivity, flexibility and wellbeing. The Center for Disease Control reports that injuries are the leading cause for low productivity in sports and the workplace. The CDC also reports that only 1 in 5 injuries are reported, therefore the cost to the public is five times higher than reported.

This is an opportunity for Massage Therapists and Athletic Trainers to be an integral part of the prevention and reporting network. As a certified Injury Prevention Technologist (IPT), you will be able to assess where teams and individuals are potentially injured or overused. Injury Prevention Technologists will be able create programming to prevent further injury and reduce costs associated with injury.

William Ron McKnight, Principle of Center for Therapeutic Massage and Athletics, since 1986, Ron is trained in massage and acupuncture. He has been an outspoken advocate for repetitive stress injury prevention for young and old alike. He has established a non-profit organization, “The International Institute for Injury Prevention, Inc.” (TIIIPI). Ron has managed sports injury and prevention at several Olympics and the Goodwill games. He has served on the board of the American Massage Therapy Association (AMTA). Ron is the author of two publications “The End of Stretching” a booklet reveling the harmful and positive effects of stretching and its true nature. The second booklet is, “Perspectives in Palpation”, a teaching manual as the foundation for delivering programs to practitioners in injury prevention.
